Faith Based Services, Spirituality, and Aging

(See also Notes on Hospice and Palliative Care)

There has been a long tradition of church-related support for older adults in the United States. As the elderly population has increased, church-based services to the elderly have re-focused, and expanded, and churches have partnered with social and health agencies.

Historically, the Older Americans Act has supported community and in-home services through a network of government agencies and non-profit service providers, many of which have been hosted by church-based organizations. Faith-based organizations provide congregate meals, transportation, home repair, companion, and other independent living support services. Other federal agencies support faith-based housing, social service, counseling and health service programs, academic investigation of (e.g.) the influence of religion and spirituality on health, and other aspects of the mind-body-spirit connection.

Recent enactment of the “Charitable Choice” section of the federal welfare reform law indicates Congressional interest in supporting faith-based organizations. In 2001, President Bush established a Center for Faith-Based and Community Initiatives and issued an executive order to establish similar units in federal agencies. In January of 2002, Congress appropriated a $30 million Compassion Capital Fund (CCF) to the Department of Health and Human Services. This is the “first appropriated federal funds...specifically targeted to assist ... grassroots organizations that are the focus of President Bush's faith-based and community initiative.”

The following Internet sites guide users to national and local, and denominational and inter-denominational organizations that offer services to the elderly. They provide links to information sources that describe faith-based programs, the relationship between spirituality and successful aging, and the results of government sponsored research.
